WORLDANALYSIS*Proposed U.S. spending cuts would hit poor the hardest

By Elizabeth Shogren
The Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON — The poor and nearly poor in the United States would bear much of the burden of the spending cuts and program modifications contained in the massive budget bills that cleared the House and Senate last week.

Half of the program reductions in the budget packages would fall on the poorest fifth of U.S. families, according to projections by the Democratic staff of Congress' Joint Economic Committee. Another 25 per cent of the changes would be felt by the next poorest quintile of the population.

At the same time, the richest five per cent of the population would benefit from tax breaks that, on average, are almost as large as the reductions in income and health benefits facing families with children, according to a separate analysis by the Office of Management and Budget.

Republicans argue that the eventual consequence of their budget-balancing plan will be a more productive economy with greater opportunities for all Americans.

"The truth is that a balanced budget means a brighter future for our children and grandchildren," Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole said Friday in defense of the GOP budgets.

The immediate result, however, is likely to be an increase in the average rate of poverty nationwide and harder times for many families and individuals. Clinton administration officials and independent budget analysts contend.

The final scope and shape of the cuts remain subject to change because President Clinton has vowed to veto the final budget package if it resembles the House blueprint or even the slightly more moderate Senate version. The administration argues that balancing the budget is a worthy goal, but criticizes the GOP budgets for directing many of their cuts at the neediest Americans.

"The burdens are being imposed on working Americans, working poor and the poor," said Labor Secretary Robert B. Reich. "Those earning between $20,000 and $50,000 are being hurt, as well as the poor. The only people who will benefit are those earning well into six digits."

Low-wage jobs lose value

Reductions in the scope of Medicare, Medicaid, welfare and other assistance programs come when economic forces have already driven down the value of low-wage jobs available to this segment of the population.

"This exacerbates a pattern in the country over the past 15 years," Reich said. "The middle class and the poor share a smaller and smaller slice of the country's wealth. Republican leaders are exacerbating this problem."

During three days of debate in the House and Senate last week, Democrats emphasized the potential impact of the GOP budget blueprints on the poor. "It is a transparent scheme to take from the needy and give to the greedy," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

Republicans, for their part, argued just as intensely that the cost of providing federal benefits to these Americans has risen to unsustainable levels and must be brought under control.

Update

The issue: Led by dominant Republicans, the U.S. House and Senate passed budget bills in an attempt to balance the budget and cut the deficit.

What's new: Democrats and other analysts say the poorest fifth of the U.S. population would bear half the burden, the next highest fifth, another 25 per cent, while the richest five per cent would get massive tax breaks.

What's next: Republicans believe a more productive economy would result, bringing more prosperity to all Americans, while Democrats and others argue the results would be no more effective than Reaganomics, which did not raise all Americans on one economic raft, as promised.

"Do we want to pay our debts, or do we want our children and grandchildren to pay for the government we want to give to people but can't afford?" asked Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M.

For congressional Republicans, this argument has all but replaced Ronald Reagan-era economic rhetoric about rising tides lifting all boats.

"For 40 years the federal government has been preoccupied in doing things for people who are riding in the wagon. Our new Republican majority is determined to do something for people who are pulling the wagon for a change," said Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, a GOP presidential contender.

For better or worse, the budget changes represent a major shift in the relationship between federal government and the poor.

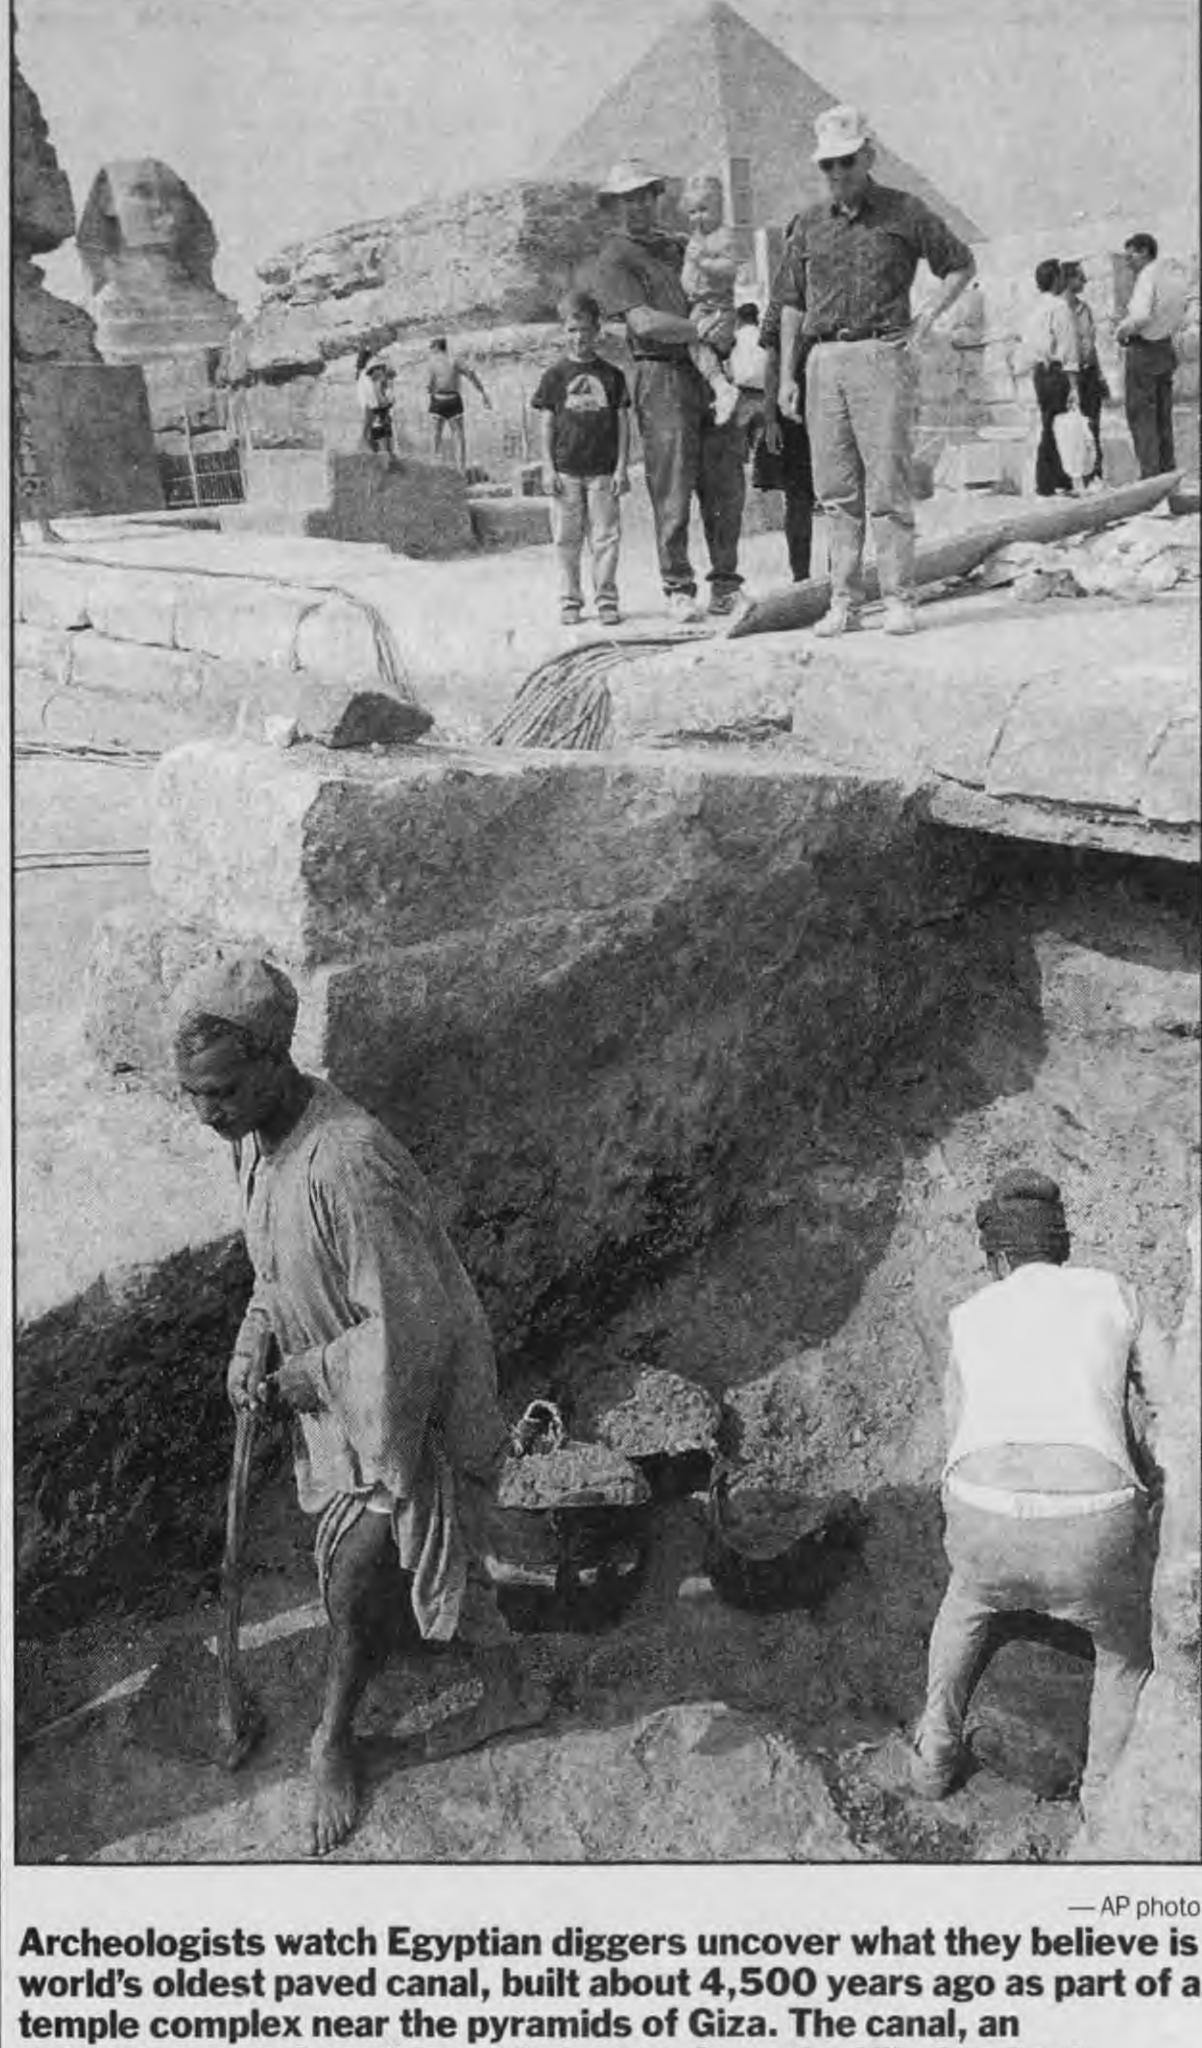

Budget analysts say the prospective impact on low-income Americans would be much greater — both in dollar and percentage terms — than cuts approved during the Reagan administration.

If the GOP budgets go into effect as written, annual spending on means-tested programs would be $75 billion less by the year 2002 than under current law. That would amount to a reduction of some 22 per cent.

The Reagan administration cuts, by contrast, reduced spending on such programs by $11 billion (in inflation-adjusted dollars) in 1985, the year of their greatest impact, a decline of about 10 per cent, according to an analysis by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a Washington-based liberal research institute.

"We're talking about very substantial and steadily deepening weakening of assistance to all types of poor people. Among those hit hardest are the working poor and the elderly and disabled poor," said Robert Greenstein, the centre's executive director.

The GOP budget would deeply cut big-ticket entitlement programs: Medicare, the health insurance program for the elderly; Medicaid, which provides health benefits and nursing home care to the poor and disabled; Aid to Families with Dependent Children, the primary cash-assistance program for the poor; Supplemental Security Income; food stamps; child nutrition; student loans; veterans benefits and civil service retirement.

Archeologists watch Egyptian diggers uncover what they believe is world's oldest paved canal, built about 4,500 years ago as part of a temple complex near the pyramids of Giza. The canal, an antiquities scholar said, carried water from the Nile for ritual bathing of pharaoh Chephren, whose pyramid is the second largest of the three at Giza.

As it was, both vessels were under constant surveillance by warships and had been buzzed by helicopters and military jets.

"On Monday we had a zodiac full of commandos sneak up on us in the dark," he said. "We don't know what their intent was but they came up to our vessel and only when we put a searchlight on them did they make a retreat."

Environmentalists swamped the main post office in Paris Saturday with hundreds of bundles of petitions addressed to President Jacques Chirac.

About 50 Greenpeace activists took the main post office near the Louvre by surprise, depositing what the group said was 2.5 tonnes of protest petitions containing seven million signatures from all over the world.

"We expected Chirac to finally listen to the world protest," Greenpeace spokeswoman Franse Verdeuzel donk said from the group's Dutch office.

Friday's explosion, the third in the current series, was about 60 kilotons, or three times the force of the bomb that destroyed Hiroshima, Japan during the Second World War.
